Have A Nice Day

At one point in one of our conversations, I told Patty that I believed that a person is not, as far as a fairly broad standard is applied, unique.

One's brain is, maybe, at a certain resolution, we hope.

But as far as, say, the test results of a comprehensive battery of psychological examinations are concerned, there's about a thousand others on the planet that would be indistinguishable.

Someone is more pessimistic than me for once.

In Bill O'Neill's Fun Knowledge Encyclopedia Vol.3, page 38, he claims that number to be 7,100.

There is no explanation further than that given, and no section of the book containing more data on any of the claims made therein, so where this information stems from as far as verifiable research is concerned is anyone's guess.

Just found it interesting that someone who has such a dim, realistic view of the population found someone who has seven times that.

Have a nice day. Fucking clone.
